Conversation

Story by Peter Lobred • Photography by Roger Wade

Honka Homes' Pekka Laine didn't know what to think when the president of his graduate school requested materials on building a log home. "We were talking at a European alumni meeting in Budapest, and Dr. Herberger said he wanted more information from our company," Pekka recalls. "I thought maybe he asked that of all his former students, just to be polite."

Several days later, Pekka knew the conversation was more than small talk when he received an e-mail from Roy Herberger explaining that he and his wife Pam had land in northern Arizona on which they wanted a log home—specifically, a Honka log home.

Opposite: Builder Paul Overman came up with the unique masonry scheme to surround the hearth. Right: A secluded hallway off the great room leads to the master bedroom.
